Climatic Conditions And Life. With reference to the remarks made on p. 89, no. 24, of Natural Science (Feb., 1893), regarding a suggestion of mine as to former climatic conditions--I.--May I be permitted to point out that so far as I know there is no limit to the extent of the areas over which these phenomena (fumaroles or hot-springs) might be manifested. A whole continent might, in former times, have been covered with them and the character of its vegetation and animal life determined by them--though it was set itself in a frozen sea. Such an extreme case is, I think, a possibility. In India where we have flows of trap or lava, altogether covering an area of 200,000 square miles, we learn to look at such questions from a somewhat liberal scale of measurement. II.--Chemical deposits are by no means invariably formed by hot springs. And even in those cases where they are formed they are not always of so stable a character as to leave permanent traces. Still it may be the case that beds of limestone occurring in association with such fossils as I have referred to may really have been derived from the calcareous deposits (travertine) of hot springs. III.--It is scarcely needful to add that fossil localities often occupy very narrow and restricted areas. Science and Art Museum, Dublin, V. Ball. February 12, 1894. The Geological Society s Journal.
